

I think that there are two reasons why "Let it go" shaked hearts of people all over japan.

The first reason is that words of the song overlap the blocked state covering Japanese society now.

It is true that economy around the urban area has recovered recently, while the regional economy has been under harsh conditions for a long time.

The increases of the tax and prices have made many people worse off.

They may have sympathized with the heroin's positive thinking and the words leading them into positive way of living.

The second reason is that this song is sung by a young woman in the movie.

More and more women have taken various careers in society in recent years.

Yet,actually Japanese society is still male-dominant.

In fact,many women have expeiences of being harassed and discriminated in different ways.

Therefore they must have been moved to tears by the words that encourage them to live freely facing up to harsh reality.

In Japan,decreasing and aging of the population are progressing at the same time.

You often see these phenomena in the regions far from Tokyo.

I think it is decreasing and aging of the population that may cause many local governments to disappear.

In addition,not a few of the residents in the rural area have moved to the urban area recently, which has resulted in the loss of jobs and made it difficult to pass the traditionl events to the next generation .

Therefore,some local cities have become less and less fascinating.

If the local governments were to go out, what problems would the residents there be faced with?

First of all,they would not be able to continue their daily lives.

The reason is because the local authority plays an important role in many fields,such as collection of gabage and waste,water supply care of children,education and so on, while residents there depend on the administration to a large extent.

Unless the administration works, the stores and companies left there will go away ,and finally those areas will get more deserted.

The "Obento" or "Bento" in Japan is a meal packed in the box compactly.

It is one of the Japanese cultures,which is said to have developed into a kind of art recently.

For example,in Japan, a common housewife oftne makes beautiful or unique bento that expresses faces of animation characters, shapes of animal and letters with colorful foods for her children and husband.

It is sometimes called "chara ben",or character's bento.

The beauty of bento is sure to impress people overseas strongly.

I think that uniqueness of Japanese bento has been grown up and carried in the Japanese culture for a long time.

For example, my mother would often have my family excited by expressing a shape of octopus with sausage, faces with pieces of dry foods and flags with fruits of ume in their bentoes in my childhood.

Besides,if you trace back the history, you will find Japanese consciousness of beauty in something scaled down and reproduced , such as "hakoniwa", "bonsai",and "kazarimakizushi"

Uniqueness of bento must be an extension of Japanese traditional culture.
